

Acknowledgements

I would like to celebrate the completion of this thesis by acknowledging the help and support of the many people who have made it possible and, mostly, enjoyable! Let me begin by thanking Jack Whitehead, exemplary scholar, fiercely loving man and extraordinary supervisor whose evident pleasure in all our efforts and determination to meet each of us on the ground of our own being has been such an inspiration.

Thanks too, to Eden Charles, Jacqui Scholes-Rhodes and Paul Roberts, fellow travellers and members of Jack's supervision group, for support, challenge and friendship on the way. The wider CARPP community has provided the setting for this work and I am grateful to Peter Reason and Judi Marshall both for particular conversations and for their work in establishing and promoting the kind of research community of which I am proud to be a member. I also appreciate the care and thoroughness with which my examiners Professor Helen Simons and Doctor Donna Ladkin tested and extended my own understanding of the thesis.

Two loving friends, Moira Laidlaw and Chris Seeley spent days, if not weeks, reading drafts of my thesis and helping me understand what I had achieved and how much better it could become. Chris's artistic and typographic flair has contributed immeasurably to the appearance and final form of the text and I owe my profound sense of the power of one person's story to change the world to Moira's appreciative and deeply challenging response to my first draft.

I am grateful too, to all those who have taken a leap of faith to join me in various educational action inquiries over the past fifteen years or so: in particular the members of the Hertfordshire Constabulary Developing Ourselves as Leaders project who brought so much of themselves to our inquiry group and taught me so much about the pleasures and pitfalls of facilitating co-operative inquiry. The many others who have welcomed me into their company and shared their learning about menswork, loving relationships, healing journeys and about education are simply too numerous to mention but are nonetheless appreciated for their wisdom and kindness.

My thanks also go to the late Peter Sharpe and to Paul Acres, successive Chief Constables of the Hertfordshire Constabulary for their sponsorship of a Bramshill Fellowship to fund my research and for their personal interest in its progress and outcomes. Such “official” support for non-conventional research is crucial in opening up the police service to new ways of thinking and relating to the world.

For Alison, my lover and best friend for so much of the five years I have been researching and writing this thesis, I feel a deep respect and affection. Thank you for your integrity and generosity and for your unequivocal support and forbearance as I so often disappeared into the solitary processes of reading, writing and reflection.

Finally, I dedicate this work to my ex-wife Sara Mead in recognition of the twenty-five years we spent together and to our children Nicola, James, Georgina and Thomas and granddaughter Poppy who are the future we once dreamed of.
